Mrs. Walker and her daughter (a beautiful girl of 17.) wept tears of joyful thankfulness, and they all cried out together they were not disappointed in their expectations of the 'glorious Land of Liberty.' Captain Bursley told the story in a very few words. He said that a lady came on board his vessel with four or five children who wanted passage from Liverpool to New York. He took them into the cabin and became very much interested in them. In three or four days after the ves sel had been at sea, a passenger in a peasant's dress presented himself on the quarter-deck and asked for Mrs. Walker.

A Peep at Fashionable Life .- A couple of lawyers who do not circulate amongst the "upper ten," desirous of penetrating into the secrets of fashionable life, adopted the singular experiment of mounting upon one another's shoulders and peeping into windows. Severstreet the other night, were assembled in their parlor around a work-table, chatting and conversing gaily, when a man tumbled heels over head into their midst. One of the two lawyers mentioned above, had mounted upon the other's shoulders in a kind of craw-fish fashion, and was luxuriating in the loveliness of the fair ones there assembled, when the other, through freak or whim, gave a sudden lurch, and sent his colleague headlong into the room of the ladies, came into the room and ejected the gentleman as suddenly as he had entered.
